1889: A state Board of Health is established in Washington State Constitution. They provide recommendations to the Governor and Legislature for recommendation to the public.

1911: The state Board of Health bans the Everett Health Board, because the state has been found not to be operating as an independent unit has success in curbing typhoid fever through activities.

1934: The city of Everett sends Typhoid fever to the Washington State Board of Health. They recommend a Sanitary Code for Everett. The Everett City Jail and Providence Hospital are set up around Everett, with an isolation ward at Paine Avenue. The Everett Health Board is composed of 15 members. The Board includes all five Snohomish County Council members. They work together as a new unit has success in curbing typhoid fever through activities.

1940: More sanitarians are added to the department. The city of Everett sends Typhoid fever to the Washington State Board of Health. They recommend a Sanitary Code for Everett. The Everett City Jail and Providence Hospital are set up around Everett, with an isolation ward at Paine Avenue. The Everett Health Board is composed of 15 members. The Board includes all five Snohomish County Council members. They work together as a new unit has success in curbing typhoid fever through activities.

1946: Mrs. Lavinia Gordon becomes the first public health nurse in Snohomish County and a part-time pediatrician. She is the first public health nurse in the state. She is also the first public health nurse in the United States.

1958: The Everett City Jail and Providence Hospital are set up around Everett, with an isolation ward at Paine Avenue. The Everett Health Board is composed of 15 members. The Board includes all five Snohomish County Council members. They work together as a new unit has success in curbing typhoid fever through activities.

1959: The District laboratory moves from Everett to the Snohomish County Health Department building. The District laboratory moves from Everett to the Snohomish County Health Department building. The District laboratory moves from Everett to the Snohomish County Health Department building. The District laboratory moves from Everett to the Snohomish County Health Department building. The District laborato